Type 'fundraising tips' into Google and you'll find literally millions of links worth of ideas on how to raise money. We've saved you the bother of reading them by providing you with this definitive list of fundraising tips that work – follow these and you'll be fine. Really, you'll raise plenty!

know your donor.

(they're just like you)

The truth is, events like the RIDE are common. Thousands of people participate every week in some form of ride, walk, or run. Last year in North America, over 1.6 billion was raised from the top 30 walk/run/ride events. For example, Relay for Life has raised over $400 million!

All this to say, millions of us give and will give to these types of events this year, so when we get asked, we aren't surprised or annoyed – especially when we know the person asking. Understand that most of the people you ask have given before to other friends, and will likely give to you too – so relax!

(or, ignore what I just said)

While your friends and family may 'get' the whole event-based donation thing, they expect to be treated right. They expect you to ask them personally, whether by email, letter, video call, or face-to-face. If you send out "Dear Nobody Specific" spam just because you're too lazy to spend the extra 5 minutes to write their name and include a personal greeting, don't be surprised when they don't give you a dime. Would you?

If your email or letter isn't personal, it isn't worth reading. Don't make it a long fork-in-the-eye letter either – just make it easy for them to know where, how far, why, and when you are riding. Definitely make sure you include your page link so they can act in the moment.

(but don't be stupid)

Everyone needs a goal. It's okay to stretch for it, but be reasonable! If you hang around lots of people with money, you should expect to raise larger denominations. The average donor to events like the RIDE gives $50. Can you get 5-6 donors like that? Sure you can. So why not set a $500 goal? If you hit it the first week, you can kick back and relax, or edit your goal and raise even more. Be sure to include your goal in your letter to your donors – it helps them to have some context on how much it is you are trying to raise when they are donating.

give to yourself first.

(if you won't, why should your donor?)

This is basic: if you don't have the conviction to sponsor yourself, why are you asking me to support you? Prove you mean it by giving to yourself first. Give for the right reasons, but don't give anonymously – it helps when the people you ask see you've dropped some coin too! It doesn't matter how much you give generally (as long as you do), but if you're not cash-strapped, a $20 gift will seem a bit cheap when the average is $50.

(starting is half the battle)

Don't wait to be in the mood to ask people for money – that mood isn't likely going to hit you anytime soon. Begin now! Draft your letter using our email template, identify your 30-40 prospects you want to hit up, send a test email to yourself to be sure everything works properly, and just... begin! Send three personal emails by 4 pm and then go home. Tomorrow ask a co-worker to lunch and hit them up for $50. Nice, you've got momentum. Next day, fire off a nice letter to your mom or dad – that will boost your morale. Got it? Make it a daily campaign and you'll be good – whatever you do, begin now, don't wait until the night before.

(but never pushy)

People don't mind being asked, but don't be pushy. Stalking and 4 am calls: bad. If you've connected personally and made it easy for them to give, then give it a rest. People don't usually forget – they get busy or bothered or burdened or distracted... just like you. So ask, remind them once, and then send everyone one more reminder 48 hours before your RIDE and leave it at that.

share your story.

(because people give to people)

People know the world is broken – they see the sad headlines every day. So don't flood them with endless data. The best thing you can do is to share your story about why this issue matters to you. Be authentic and transparent – they'll find it refreshing and attractive. Share your story and let them respond to you, because in the end, people give to people.

say thank you.

(and follow up)

Mom was right: good manners go a long way in life. We need to say thank you, especially to your donors. So make sure you do it – say thank you and follow up with a short, fun report on how your RIDE went and how your campaign ended up. This closes the loop appropriately for your donors (and sets you up nicely to connect with them next year).
